A squad of city detectives was put to work in State street department stores today to guard against a new peril for girls who work behind the counters. They will watch three stores carefully, the Fair, Boston Store and Woolworth's.

The police are seeking a band of men who have infested the stores, selling "chance books" to underpaid girl clerks. The soft money worked from male customers by the scheme goes to the men behind the graft; the department store girls get a small rake-off.

A number of men have been working the stores for months. They approach a girl behind the counter, talk
